embedded servers run using the .net framework, providing similar ease-of-use as the client-server? A: Which is better is relative to what you are trying to achieve. They both have their strengths and weaknesses, and .Net applications have a lot of them. .Net Applications have several built-in resources. They are embedded in the runtime. They do not require any install or configuration beyond the initial .Net Framework. .Net Applications use IIS for deployment, and since they have the benefit of IIS, they can use .Net features that IIS might not be able to use. (IIS 5.1 has very limited support for using .Net Features in itself.) .Net Applications do require updates to the .Net Framework, just like any other application. (If you are using .Net Framework 2.0 you don't have to worry about it, but IIS 5.0 and 5.1 require updates as well.) .Net Applications use the same runtime as .Net web services, which means that they are not isolated like a Windows Service. This can be a good thing if you can't use .Net services on some client boxes, or if you want to deploy them on the same box as other programs that use .Net Services, or something like that. For deploying, either one of them would work. You would use the one that makes most sense for you. If you don't have a lot of options, perhaps it would be better to install the .Net runtime on a separate box and use that box for your .Net application.
